Located diagonally across from the Rockbridge County Court House on a busy intersection in the heart of town, the Alexander-Withrow House sets the tone for much of the historic flavor of Lexington. The present picturesque appearance of the house is the result of a number of alterations, the most major of which occurred in the 1850's when the level of the adjacent streets was lowered ten feet. This change in level resulted in the main floor of the house becoming the second floor set on a full story of limestone underpinning. This street level, with its large windows and fine stonework has long been rented out to retail shops. The original main entrance to the house now opens onto a small balcony with a decorative cast-iron balustrade supported on large cast-iron brackets. At some point during the mid-nineteenth century, the present shallow hipped roof with its deep Italianate bracketed cornice was placed on the house. The exact form of the original roof is uncertain, but it is thought to have been a gable roof. The position of the four corner chimneys has not been changed, although the shafts may have been lowered. The most conspicuous feature of the house is the brick walls set with glazed headers to form a diaper pattern throughout. Although an original opening in the center of the side wall on the second floor level has been bricked up, the walls survive generally unscarred. Most of the sash in the house is old, and nearly all of it on the third floor is original. A later one-story wooden gallery has been placed across the rear wall and overlooks a narrow areaway.

The interior of the building has been altered with the changing of some of the partitions, but much of the original woodwork survives, including a fine but compact Federal type stair. Most of the interior trim is quite simple.

After standing in a state of poor repair for many years, the house has recently been renovated by the Historic Lexington Foundation.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Alexander-Withrow House was built for a prominent Lexington merchant, William Alexander, around 1790. The house was built on lots purchased by Alexander from the trustees of Lexington in 1784, when the town was originally laid out. In 1800, the house was bought from the Alexander estate by John Leyburn. One of the Leyburn children who grew up in the house presented a romantic picture of it when he wrote:

It was square, hip-roofed, with a tall chimney towering up from each corner and built of brick, some of which were glazed and set in the wall as to form a succession of diamonds. . . . The old house was in most respects a pleasant abode. Its apartments, for that day, seemed spacious and airy; the prospect of the surrounding hills and majestic mountains was beautiful and grand and the great piles of glazing hickory on the capacious hearth glowed with comfort and cheerfulness, as we gathered around it.

The house remained in the Leyburn family until 1851, when it was purchased by George A. Baker. In 1901, it became the property of the Withrow family, and it remained in their possession until 1969, when it was acquired by the Historic Lexington Foundation.

The Alexander-Withrow House survives as one of the oldest dwellings in Lexington and one of the most interesting architecturally. It is believed that it is the only house in the center of town to have escaped the disastrous fire which swept the village in 1796. The well-defined diaper pattern in the brick walls is an unusual feature for its time and place, and it is thought that this is the only example of such work in the Shenandoah Valley. Equally interesting are the four corner chimneys. Corner chimneys of this type occur on a few other late-eighteenth century Rockbridge County houses, but this motif has not been observed elsewhere in Virginia.

The association of the Alexander-Withrow House with several old Lexington families, together with its conspicuous location and unusual architectural features combine to make the structure one of the most prominent and cherished of Lexington landmarks.
